EX Libris -

So you don't like to come to the library because you can't ever find anything? You don't know where to look for a book? Are all those letters and numbers just a jumble?

You have a very wide-spread disease commonly known as LC-itis or the Library of Congress Classification Blues.

This malady, which is caused by a "bug" which multiplies and expands rapidly and erratically, usually attacks persons connected with educational facilities at the university level when they enter the libraries of the institutions.

Here in the St. Pete Campus library we now have some help for this complaint. We have posted large charts explaining the system used in assigning books to their proper shelves.

The next time you are in the library spend a few minutes reading the chart and see how the system evolves. It's really interesting. Look on stacks No. 3 and 5, and on the back of the card catalog, too. (If you still can't find any books, ask the librarian. Maybe she can't find them either, but then you never know.)
