Seminar Looks At Women's Skills In Supervisory Jobs

"Authority and Power Relationships: Their Effect in the Workplace," focusing on the skills used by women in supervisory positions, continues today.

The seminar is offered by the USF Center for Continuing Education in cooperation with the USF College of Business Administration. It is part of the Women Supervisors Masters Certificate Program designed to develop a sound educational background about and for the emerging woman supervisor.

USF professors Dr. Ellen Kimmel, educational psychology, and Dr. Dorothy N. Harlow, management, created and teach the series. Both are widely known in their fields, Dr. Harlow for her course "Management of Professionals and her workshop "Women as Managers" and Dr. Kimmel for her nationwide lectures and her publications and workshops about women's employment and career patterns. The two also originated and team teach USF's graduate program in "Women in Educational Administration," a special summer program which will be offered for the third time in summer 1977.

More than 200 persons, mostly women, have enrolled in one or more of the five Women as Supervisors seminars since they began at USF a year and a half ago. These have included persons in mid-management positions in city, county and state government agencies, industry, business and utility companies, as well as persons interested in moving into administration.
